SYNOPSIS

ACT I

Don Alfonso, an elderly cynic of 18th Century Naples, declares to his young friends, Ferrando and Guglielmo, that no woman can be trusted, including their sweethearts. Enraged, the young men accept Alfonso's wager to let him put the girls to any test he chooses.

Don Alfonso announces to the two distressed young ladies that their fiancés have to rejoin their regiment immediately. There is a touching farewell scene and the two officers ostensibly sail away.

Alfonso bribes the maid, Despina, to help him introduce Ferrando and Guglielmo, who return disguised as strange looking Albanians. Fiordiligi orders the Albanians to leave. The young men are delighted at the girls' faithfulness, but Alfonso warns that the wager is not yet won.

In the garden the sisters unite in grief. The men, still in disguise, stagger in saying that they can no longer live if their love is not returned. Whereupon they apparently poison themselves and fall to the ground. The ladies show signs of weakening. Despina, disguised as a doctor, revives the "Albanians" with a huge magnet. They renew their ardent attack on the ladies' affections but are again repulsed.

ACT II

At Despina's urging, Dorabella, especially, weakens and decides that a flirtation will do no harm.

Guglielmo woos Dorabella and secures a locket as a token of her love. Fiordiligi also weakens and admits her love to Ferrando. The triumphant Don Alfonso urges the men to accept women as they are, forcing them to concede defeat.

Confronted by the returning fiancés, the sisters blame Don Alfonso and Despina for leading them astray, whereupon their lovers reveal to their duped sweethearts that they were the "Albanians." The couples sort themselves out and all is forgiven and forgotten.
